Adobe's portrait portfolio app launched just last summer. It's a free utility that lets you glance at your photos and videos and select the best of those, then have a look at Photoshop to see how editing could have improved them. It's so easy to use in a variety of ways that this could be a really useful app for hobbyist photographers. You might not know it, but you actually have an unknown number of previously used files that have been sitting unused. Your old photos. Your copyright-free vintage stock photos. Your classifieds. All of them. All pre-dated the Internet and don't have any copyright protection, so nobody is expecting you to cover the labor costs of re-uploading them online. All of them are in an easy to access and share format and, since you're getting 90 day free trials, you can experiment with them without feeling like you're committing a crime. We know that there's a lot you can do with Creative Cloud APIs in Flex. We've been working with a large number of third party developers to help support their creative workflows in ways we haven't seen before. Additionally, we know that customers and partners that are building apps and services around Flex have been asking an important question: where is the flexibility to add new APIs for third party developers? In this release you'll see that we're taking the component model to its logical conclusion. Flex apps are now always components. This means that you can publish your Adobe JQuery Mobile application to Adobe Labs and continue building features in your Flex codebase.

What It Does: With thousands of plug-ins and filters available, it's often hard to know what the best filters are in the program. With the Layer Filter Gallery, you can easily discover the best filters for the job. Today, I want to share with you some of what we've been working on to bring Photoshop to the web alongside another great team member, Nabeel Al-Shamma. This is a public GitHub release . When you open it in the browser, you'll see the very first web version of Photoshop, which includes support for the canvas, Skelton, WebAudio, Emscripten, and other APIs. Adobe intends this to be the first of many improvements and re-imaginings of our product, so don't be surprised if some of the functionality in this release is missing from a future release. Also, please let us know what you think and share your thoughts on our forums if you run into a bug or have an idea for a new feature. Thanks for testing with us! You now have access to the full power of the Product Performance Console (just choose the Images tab), which lets you easily search for performance issues, and then identify which JavaScript or CSS libraries are to blame. As you work, you can see where in the DOM the browser is rendering your CSS and JavaScript, and the performance. And you can easily turn on and off trace files that will help you learn what JavaScript and CSS code is being executed in the browser. You can also see where time is being spent in response to mouse and keyboard events, and even page transitions. e3d0a04c9c

Skintones are now easier to access and modify thanks to improvements in the new G.I.R.L. (Gene's Inverted Rainbow look) library. You can apply adjustments to compensate for green, yellow, and blue casts in subjects, making skin look healthier and more natural. PNG files now require less storage space, using less than half the space of a typical JPEG file. PNG support is enabled by default in any version of Photoshop starting with Photoshop CC (16.5). OnlySpotColor support is now off by default. When selected, onlySpotColor reduces the number of spots used to create the color appearance of each element in an image. Vintage Image gives you a soft, natural look by blending the colors of an original image with colors from similar images. You can find original-style images in the library and use them to work with. Artboards now stay open as long as they're being worked on or you're actively arranging your images in the Layers panel. Artboards change size and position automatically if you place a new layer over an existing one. It's something you'd almost take for granted, but do yourself a favor and learn about the new features this year ahead.
