The treatment of gingival defects may be challenging because of technical difficulties in obtaining an adequate amount of healthy connective tissue. A new expanded polytetrafluoroethylene-expanded prosthetic tissue matrix (E-PTM) is a non-resorbable, biocompatible, and sterile, absorbable collagen membrane that is used as a biomaterial for the closure of soft tissue perforations. This pilot study evaluated the treatment of extensive gingival defects with relationship of young adolescents' self-concept, as reflected in self-esteem, self-efficacy, and coping, with self-reported coping behavior and coping self-efficacy. The first study (N = 85 adolescents) showed that self-esteem was more strongly related to reported use of maladaptive coping behaviors than was self-efficacy, whereas self-efficacy was more strongly related to reported use of adaptive coping behaviors than was self-esteem. Study 2 (N = 202 mothers) showed that high self-esteem was related to more use of safety behaviors than were low self-esteem mothers, whereas self-efficacy was unrelated to use of safety behaviors. The general pattern was also found with teachers' ratings, in study 3 (N = 35 teachers) and in the combined data.
