pattern of hepatic glycogen deposition in neonatal rats treated with 2-deoxy-D-glucose. The distribution of glycogen was analyzed in the liver, spleen, and skeletal muscle of young rats (30-d-old) treated with the glycolytic inhibitor 2-deoxy-D-glucose (2DG). 2DG reduced liver glycogen levels to an average of 13.5% of control, while the spleen and muscle glycogen levels were unaffected. The distribution of liver glycogen was examined by light and electron microscopy. 2DG induced the formation of large glycogen deposits, frequently juxtaposed to the sinusoidal plasma membrane of hepatocytes, and in the Kupffer cells of the liver. The deposits were difficult to identify in the liver in control animals, since their size was usually below the resolution of light microscopy. In contrast, the 2DG treatment induced the formation of diffuse, globular deposits, easily detected in the liver by electron microscopy. The glycogen deposits were more numerous in the area of the hepatocytes facing the sinusoidal lumen than in the perisinusoidal region. Since these globular structures are similar to those containing the glycogen
