A park is a pleasant environment with green areas, sports facilities, playgrounds, cycling paths, walking paths, hills and paths for people with different abilities. It is a good investment for the environment. A number of benefits are associated with the use of green spaces, as well as with public services in general. By making the public more active, healthier people contribute to a cleaner environment. There is also a great sense of wellbeing from parks. This also has an influence on economic growth in towns, making citizens feel that they live in a better environment. This means that local communities will need to prepare for a dense population, with a concomitant demand for land, open spaces and other facilities. This is why it is important to choose a design that allows for parks to grow and offer their inhabitants an increasingly pleasant environment. A new study by CEPON, conducted by the Swedish Research Institute for Environmental Sciences, presents the results of a survey of urban and regional authorities regarding how parks and open spaces are currently managed.
