Plasmon nanoparticle based electrochemical biosensor for the detection of mycotoxins. A surface plasmon resonance (SPR)-based optical biosensor was developed for rapid detection of citrinin (CTN) and aflatoxin B(1) (AFB(1)). The SPR absorption spectra of the biosensor were monitored upon exposure to aflatoxin B(1) (AFB(1)) and citrinin (CTN). The biosensor construction was based on a gold substrate, which was synthesized using a controlled dealloying process. A biosensor system was fabricated by immobilizing a single conformation of neomycin B (NeoB) on gold nanoparticles (AuNPs). Due to the immobilization of the analytes, the maximum reflectivity of the system significantly changed. Both NeoB and AFB(1) can interact with AuNPs which alter the system's reflectivity. The association of NeoB with the AuNPs is favored due to an attractive force of amino-specific gold-surface interaction and it further increases the AuNPs' capability to absorb the incident light. Furthermore, the association of AFB(1) with AuNPs significantly increased their capability to absorb light. The maximum
