test cricket is an event in itself. ashes 2009 does a great job of making you feel as if you are there, even if for only a few minutes at a time. after all, who doesn't want to be on a field in sydney, watching half a dozen players go after a ball in a melbourne storm? but that's where ashes 2009's accessibility lets it down. it all looks very pretty, both in terms of its 3d graphics and the accompanying camera work. but the cricket variety is limited. an always-in-play fielding camera view allows you to make out what's going on around you, with a limited section of the ground visible at a time, but since the entire field is always visible, the gameplay never takes advantage of this fact. there's no commentary to be had from a variety of different commentators, no option to mute the near constant music in the background, and with the occasional pop-up of a text box to talk to other players, no in-game chatter. as a result, there's just too little at play to make ashes 2009 feel like an all-encompassing experience. i have nothing but good things to say about ashes 2009's presentation of the action. australia and england fields both look great with a variety of pitches for each country. while there's little excitement in the cricket due to the lack of commentary, there is plenty of animation and movement. players look great running between the wickets. there's just no way around the number of artificial limitations ashes sports games seem to have these days. for example, i was routinely killed mid-over by balls that curved away from me, which is clearly not the case in real cricket. a few more custom fields would also be nice, but the standard test arena does a fantastic job capturing the feel of the real thing. the only thing that feels out of place is the in-between innings break. it's the not that ashes 2009 uses the time in between overs to advertise brands, but that the advertisement breaks are so short that they just don't feel like an opportunity to relax. 5ec8ef588b
