Darkroom support has also improved with the new integration of a card catalog with Darkroom. I do not really have anything bad to say about Lightroom's integration with Darkroom, or for that matter, any of the other plugins. However, the developers should have probably simplified the card catalog. Having things like a card catalog and a Finder window means that you have, too, two windows to resize on launch. Well, I do not think that's what they had in mind. I think a much better way Flash would have featured a more refined card catalog so that you can sort collections by tag, date and editing preference. You can also add YourCollections and Image Browser collections, as well as previews of images that you have imported, just as you can in the Darkroom desktop version. The Finder window now displays all collections, even those in other modules. Unfortunately, it does not show a preview of images in other collections, but the next version of Lightroom, with the new Import module, will feature an Related Images view that will allow you to preview all images that are related to the current image. For the photographer, reviews and feedback from your peers is useful at every step of the creative process. Imagine a simplified version of Stock X for every stock photo site around. Imagine a Gallery X that lets you organize and tag all images in a single folder. Imagine a spotlight on popular tags. Wouldn't it be easier to find or even create a useful image if you could tell which specific version(s) of a photo you've seen on a specific website? Wouldn't it be nice to be notified when you are tagged in an image? Adobe listened.
