This relates generally to computer systems, and more particularly to reducing power consumption in portable computing systems. Portable computing devices, such as notebook computers, contain a wide variety of electronic components. These electronic components consume a significant amount of power. For example, a typical portable computing device may contain a processor, memory, storage devices, audio and video circuitry, and other electronic components. Each of these components may operate based on clock signals provided to the components by a clock controller. The clock controller may be contained in a voltage regulator module that supplies power to the voltage regulator module from a power source. The power source may be contained in a transformer that has a regulated voltage for providing power to the voltage regulator module. The voltage regulator module converts the regulated voltage from the transformer to a voltage used by the voltage regulator module. This conversion may cause power losses that are undesirably high for portable computing devices that contain a significant amount of electronic circuitry. To reduce power consumption, certain portable computing devices may be designed to have a relatively lower power consumption mode and a relatively higher power consumption mode. In the low power consumption mode, the portable computing device may be configured to reduce power to components that are not immediately needed by the portable computing device. In the high power consumption mode, the portable
