The new smart clone feature is quite useful (and I tip my PS hat to the designers who contributed to the feature). In a normal case, I would just hit Copy (or, even better, use the shortcut) to duplicate a part of an image. But in many cases, I want to make a clone of something that is bigger than the original, for example, a block of text. This requires shrinking the original image and pasting in another. Usually I would use some other tool to shrink it, then go back via the menu and paste the image into its original state. I might even expand it slightly in Photoshop to match my original. The new smart clone feature allows you to quickly and easily shrink the original and paste it into the same position. And if you work with images with many different backgrounds, it's quite likely that you'll save time by shrinking the original and continuing on with the clone, without worrying that the original is going to end up showing through. The ability to duplicate and swap out faces in the same image is a really cool idea. Names are also great input into the file, and it's great that Adobe allows you to keep the original and revert back to it via the Export command. With the native support for MTC, you can also add multimedia directly into the file. The good news is that you are not limited to video; you can include in the file all types of data, including text. With this version, you can preserve and apply your changes using vector technology, so you can easily mask, retain, edit or move things like text, photos and logos as desired. Finally, Smart Filters are available by default, but you have the option to turn them off if you prefer that you see the results of the filters in a separate pane in Photoshop.
