The beta version of Lightroom 5 has received an official “N” rating by Apple. You can find out more about the latest version of Lightroom and its beta program here. Unfortunately, the demo version does not come with the new version, so it’s much more difficult to test the new features. So far, I didn’t run into any major issues. I had to make some effort in order to discover the new features and the problem areas. I’ve been using the beta version for several weeks, and I haven’t run into any issues while working. Even this review of the beta script performed perfectly well. This is probably a good sign. However, the beta version is still in beta and some bugs do occur. A lot, in fact. This Photo Stream feature may not be compatible with external storage devices, such as flash memory cards, external hard disc drives, or other external storage devices. This issue is addressed in the previous beta release. You can view the updated beta version here:

Not only is it bigger in a physical sense, but it is also more competent when it comes to the tools and functions available for use in its Import and Export workflow. Most of the new buttons and editing features will be covered in the following sections of this article. Keep in mind the goal here is to help you get a basic understanding of how new features operate, how they differ from those of Lightroom 4, and whether they are useful or not. I won’t be able to do that, I’m afraid. Be it for that reason, or because I haven’t used the new features in a long while (I used Lightroom 4 from version 1.0.1 through version 4.
